Generally speaking, structuring occurs when, instead of conducting a single transaction in currency in an amount that would require a report to be filed or record made by a domestic financial institution, the violator conducts a series of currency transactions, keeping each individual transaction at an amount below applicable thresholds to evade reporting or recording. Access to Environmental Justice and Judicial Independence - Case studies in Bangladesh

Introduction

Meaningful access to the justice systems and decision-making processes ensures environmental justice, democracy and creates an environment for settling environmental disputes effectively. Generally, it is perceived that meaningful access to these systems requires the citizens' capacity, political climate, institutional supports, and judiciary independence and accountability. The Human Development Report 2000 has stated that an independent judiciary is a pillar in a system of checks and balances against arbitrary power (UN 2001, p. 75). This has been argued that the judiciary's independence also ensures the accountability of the two other branches of the government: legislature and civil service. The theory assumes that the balance of power could not be achieved if the judiciary, legislature, and civil service are not effectively separated. The separation of judiciary is the necessary condition of functioning democracy and environmental justice. In many countries, the behavior of the elected representatives is like a military ruler. They do not maintain any separation of power for vested interests. Environmental justice, thus, remains unattainable and severe injustice conditions prevail. Instead, three branches of the government are merged; power is concentrated in the chief executive's office. Instead of taking institutional change, they are following the tradition of dictatorial military processes and colonial rules.
Environmental human rights are suffered in these stagnant democracies.
