8.3 Drafting

When drawing is taught as an accomplishment, the first is the aim usually proposed; while the second is the object kept chiefly in view at Marlborough House, and in the branch Government Schools of Design.

Plenty of good, useful reference material as well. Then, when it is all in shape, take the darker color, and lay some of it into the middle of the liquid color. It is a good thing to accustom yourself to hew and shape your drawing out of a dirty piece of paper.

Very great masters in water color can lay on the true forms at once with a dash, and bad masters in water color lay on grossly false forms with a dash, and leave them false; for people in general, not knowing false from true, are as much pleased with the appearance of power in the irregular blot as with the presence of power in the determined one; but we, in our beginnings, must do as much as we can with the broad dash, and then correct with the point, till we are quite right.

He sees the colors of nature exactly as they are, and therefore perceives at once in the sunlit grass the precise relation between the two colors that form its shade and light. Similarly, the wing of the Cupid in Correggio's large picture in the National Gallery is focused to two little grains of white at the top of it.

We were, in the second place, to consider a little the modes of representing water, of which important feature of landscape I have hardly said anything yet. You must now go on, again with the pen, drawing patterns, and any shapes of shade that you think pretty, as veinings in marble or tortoiseshell, spots in surfaces of shells, etc. It is sometimes necessary to draw pure outlines, as an incipient arrangement of a composition, to be filled up afterwards with color, or to be pricked through and used as patterns or tracings; but if, with no such ultimate object, making the drawing wholly for its own sake, and meaning it to remain in the state he leaves it, an artist restricts himself to outline, he is a bad draughtsman, and his work is bad.

Elements of drawing : Blessing, George F. (George Frederick), 1875

If we had been born blind, and were suddenly endowed with sight on a piece of grass thus lighted in some parts by the sun, it would appear to us that part of the grass was green, and part a dusty yellow very nearly of the color of primroses ; and, if there were primroses near, we should think that the sunlighted grass was another mass of plants of the same sulphur-yellow color.

Wide, full shapes clothes will make you look larger while trim, compact dress will make you look smaller. In the end, I have provided a sample of a draft of the will. And, farther, the color of the water itself is of three kinds: one, seen on the surface, is a kind of milky bloom; the next is seen where the waves let light through them, at their edges; and the third, shown as a change of color on the objects seen through the water.
