This shift cannot occur unless teachers model the process and teach the strategies that facilitate it. Reading Newspapers on Microfilm If you want to get a slice of life about what's been happening in the world recently, one of the best places you can turn is a daily newspaper or a weekly newsmagazine—or, these days, maybe the website for these publications. During these years, comprehension has little to do with reading instruction.

Further, an in-class library offers a setting for students to quietly read aloud and discuss a book with a peer or the teacher. Next, you can gradually release part of the process to the student and continue practicing with him or her until the student can work independently Vygotsky, 1978. That group includes five ELL students who read at a second-grade level, seven learning disabled students who read a year below grade level, eight students reading at grade level, and four above grade level.
