Memoir of the Rev. Henry Martyn, B.D by John Sargent

From Plymouth, where his sorrow was painfully renewed, by being separated from a family nearly related and greatly endeared to him, he proceeded to London; during which journey he sought, according to his settled custom, to render his conversation profitable to his fellow-travelers : and in one instance on this occasion, his attempts were not, it may be hoped, HENRY MARTYN. Before the reader proceeds to the perusal of the following memoir, it may be proper to inform him that the former part of it has been chiefly selected from various journals, which Mr.
