Percutaneous absorption of salicylic acid

Biotransformation results in detoxification and hastened elimination of some pesticides.

In vitro percutaneous absorption testing

Appendix B: Pharmacokinetics and Metabolism of Pesticides

Morphological and functional immaturities of intestinal epithelial cells account for the greater penetrability of the gut of neonatal animals and humans. The findings provide further confidence in the application of CRS for the study of drug disposition in the skin.

Enzymes frequently exist in multiple forms i. In fact, the patented Lipoderm core technology has also led to the development of an entire line of transdermal bases. Some of the more important endogenous factors include gastric emptying and intestinal motility; gut flora; acid and enzyme secretory activities; cellular transport systems; blood supply; and mucosal structure and surface area.

Walker and YAOHUI WANG and M. Slightly soluble materials are not well absorbed. The stratum corneum is composed largely of tightly adhering, cornified epithelial cells impregnated with sebum and sweat.

A good in vitro—in vivo correlation was also found when the cumulative amounts of SA which permeated in vitro were plotted against the CRS signal in the skin. You're looking at OpenBook, NAP. Newer animal models using weanling pigs, micro-pigs or mini-pigs, and human skin grafted rats appear to be viable alternatives to the use of rhesus-monkeys.
