Coalition formation and social choice

Although it's important to start with the individuals and groups mentioned above, you'll probably want to be as inclusive as possible. It is related both to cooperative and non-cooperative games, as the key concept of this theory, coalition, can be defined as a group of agents which coordinates agreements among its members, while it interacts non-cooperatively with its non-members.

Coalition Formation

Often, community problems or issues are too large and complex for any one agency or organization to tackle.

Kingmakers and leaders in coalition formation, Social Choice and Welfare

Thus negotiation linkage can arise endogenously in a free-form coalition formation game, which is a novel and interesting feature.

Coalition Formation and Social Choice

Monotonicity or equivalence is indeed a precondition for all rational behavior within this basic exchange paradigm. It's extremely useful to save seats at the table for those who can influence large numbers of others. By the same token, the individuals and organizations involved might be drawn from a narrow area of interest, or might include representatives of nearly every segment of the community, depending upon the breadth of the issue.

Coalition formation

If you need to make more complex queries, use the tips below to guide you. What happens if deterministic EPCFs do not have a unique absorbing limit? But there are papers in the literature that focus on the implications of negotiation linkage when participation can be incomplete, in particular Conconi and Perroni 2002 and Carraro and Marchiori 2004.

Thus, if some supra-national authority could force countries to link issues, this might not be a good idea. Use those contacts now, either to pull them into the circle, or to get the names of others who might be part of a core group.

Coalition Formation Theory

The combination of such persons or entities into one body, as a union, variously organized and structured, but generally less formal than a covenant. The classical application combines the Euclidean distance with the center of gravity as a consensus estimate. Without some level of coordination from somewhere, it's very unlikely that a coalition will survive and succeed.
