They would not be beings of the same nature in whom different causes produced like effects. For each individual species — man, horse, ox, lion etc.

Charles Brockden Brown / Alcuin A Dialogue First Edition 1970

Nothing, however, can be inferred from this. In the morning I had met the doctor at the bed-side of a sick friend, who had strength enough to introduce us to each other. We must suppose the conversation of the lady not destitute of attractions; but an additional, and perhaps the strongest inducement, was the society of other visitants.

Alcuin: A Dialogue by Charles Brockden Brown

You are taught to read and to write: quills, paper, and books are at hand. The boys in school know this. Here is a criterion for the choice of a profession, and which obliges us to consider the condition of women as preferable.

Alcuin

Habit has given permanence to errors, which ignorance had previously rendered universal. The reception which the present publication shall meet with will probably determine the author to withhold or print the continuation.
