Rockingham Pottery

Rockingham pottery takes its name from the estate of the Marquis of Rockingham in Yorkshire, England, where potters in the mid- to late Eighteenth Century created household objects with a characteristic lustrous mottled brown glaze. Royal and aristocratic commissions often feature the family's arms.

After this time the Pottery was barely profitable and continued through considerable assistance from the Earl. Due to the frequency with which other manufacturers' wares are mistakenly attributed to this factory, and since pieces were frequently backstamped in particular the saucers of tea services, the shapes of unmarked pieces must be matched with known Rockingham shapes to associate unmarked wares with this pottery with any confidence.
