Postmodern Narrative Theory by Mark Currie

The primary thing that Currie documents is the transition that has occurred in Narratology. The author handles this diversity by classifying parody according to its objects of imitation and specifying three major parodic kinds: parody directed at texts and personal styles, parody directed at genre, and parody directed at discourse. This book argues that literary criticism and narratology have approached narrative primarily as a form of retrospect, and demonstrates that anticipation and other forms of projection into the future offer analytical perspectives to narrative criticism and theory.

Postmodern authors are very frustrated for World War II, the Cold War, conspiracy theories. Throughout this study, Mahmoud Salami attempts to locate Fowles's fiction in the context of modern critical theory and narrative poetics. Given the general argument of this book, that narrative and narrative theory, literature and criticism, or the novel and the critic are increasingly inseparable in the postmodern age, what is the role of the critic in a world of theoretical fictions, self-conscious narratives and self-referential discourses? The problem of citation in the discourses of postmodernism, for example, is discussed with reference to syntactic theory.

But what happens when the temporal gap closes, when contemporary critics write about contemporary novels or when postmodern narrative theory takes postmodern narrative as its object? Perhaps the most apparent change is the shift from a widespread fear of and resistance to theory in narrative criticism towards an almost wholesale acceptance of its perspectives and methods, towards the canonisation of certain theorists who have become the shared reference points for disparate narratologies.

This phenomenon marks a profound change from the condition of narrative criticism as recently as 15 years ago, when critics tended to draw terminology and critical concepts from disparate sources, and where those sources often had incommensurate aims and assumptions.
