MeWe Network on the App Store

Since then, overall support for marijuana legalization has increased across all three of these generations. Researchers often think about three separate effects that can produce differences in attitudes between age groups: life cycle effects sometimes called age effects, period effects and cohort effects.

MeWe Network on the App Store

These people do not deal well with vague orders, do not adapt very well to change, and tend to avoid conflict and confrontation so they tend to make the best out of bad situations.

Millennials: The Next Greatest Generation?

Is a shift in views broad-based, reflecting a fundamental change in how all generations view an issue? But these apparently apathetic millennials are the same group that mustered and helped between 1989 and 2005 among 16-24 year olds. The political climate of early adulthood may continue to influence the political tilt of a generation throughout its life span, as noted in a. Another example of how generational analysis can aid in understanding public opinion is the case of attitudes about marijuana.
