Classroom interaction and the role of teacher in classroom interaction

The evidence suggests that a task with a requirement for information exchange is crucial to the generation of conversational modification of classroom interaction. The interaction between the teacher and the students is an essential part of teaching and learning process. Some advantages of getting students to work together are to enable them to help and learn from each other and to let them work collaborative and feel more confident when contributing in the whole group.

Interaction gives learners the opportunity to use language successfully and to measure their progress which in turn should lead to an increase in motivation.

Increasing student interaction

The more learners there are, the more difficult developing interaction can be since there are more people to monitor and, therefore, more chances of problems.

Increasing student interaction

The role of teacher in classroom interaction The teacher acts as a facilitator.

Its membership is a diverse mix of teachers, researchers, administrators, material writers, and curriculum developers whose primary focus is on enhancing English language learning, whether it is English as a second language ESL or English as a foreign language EFL. When pairing students up, it is important to consider the aim of the activity to decide whether it is more profitable to have learners with similar or different levels of ability working together. Insufficient language Perhaps the most common reason for interaction in English breaking down, or indeed not starting in the first place, is that the students don't have the language they need to interact and, therefore, complete the task successfully.
