Poems of Paul Verlaine, by Paul Verlaine

Dressed in a summer dress, Yellow and white, bestrewn with curtain-flowers; But you had lost the glistening laughingness Of our delirious former loving hours. To conclude, I will tell of the kiss Of your red lip, And how sweet my martyrdom is, — My angel! Pour un coeur qui s'ennuie, Ô le chant de la pluie! Aquarelles GREEN See, blossoms, branches, fruit, leaves I have brought, And then my heart that for you only sighs; With those white hands of yours, oh, tear it not, But let the poor gift prosper in your eyes. Open your soul and hear the sound Of my mandoline: For you I wrote this song, for you, I found This cruel, tender thing.

Evaan Verlaine

Through black grass The Kobolds go. Oh, clasp thy hands, grow pale, and turn again! O'ER THE WOOD'S BROW O'er the wood's brow, Pale, the moon stares; In every bough Wandering airs Faintly suspire.

These events have achieved mythic status. Verlaine and Artoo quietly worked out a strategy in which they would lead the pilots to believe that they had intercepted the shuttle and then release a part of the ship that the pilots would believe was an important part of the , but that was in actuality a decoy. But, O light body that my love bore, You leapt up naked, crying and happy.

How to pronounce Verlaine

Motionless, and lowering our eyes, Not thinking, dreaming. If all the future savoured of the past? Let my head loll here on your young breast Still ringing with your last kisses blessed, Allow this departure of the great tempest, And let me sleep now, a little, while you rest.
