Interestingly, not one of them finished the decade under the same ownership it had had at the beginning. The first boom in sf-magazine publishing came towards the end of the 1930s. Despite the predictions that original anthologies would replace magazines, in the USA the 1970s proved a more fertile period for new titles than the previous decade, while several of the anthology series failed.

Argosy (UK), September 1955

While the steam-powered printing press had been in widespread use for some time, enabling the boom in dime novels, prior to Munsey, no one had combined cheap printing, cheap paper and cheap authors in a package that provided affordable entertainment to working-class people. .

Nothing else could now be allowed to challenge the fantastic absurdity of the position. It was briefly called The New Argosy from 7 March-July 1942, and it also reverted briefly to standard pulp size in January 1943 before converting to a letter-size semi- in September 1943 with the shift in emphasis from a fiction magazine to a men's magazine. For the British magazines with this title, see.

Submissions

Other new magazines of 1939 were , , , and the reprint magazine. However, the significant development of the period was the appearance in 1949 of The , followed in 1950 by. This is a rather poor scan of a very rare pulp - some text is missing due to damaged pages.
