The Stoics did not expect us never to feel unpleasant sensations, which would plainly be impossible; rather, the idea was not to let such things get to us, to impact our emotional conditions. Happiness might, then, suffice for well-being, but only in the narrow sense. To take another example, a cancer patient might be more satisfied with his life than he was before the diagnosis, for he now looks at his life from a different perspective and emphasizes different virtues like fortitude and gratitude as opposed to say humility and non-complacency.

Shifts in perspective might also reasonably alter life satisfaction attitudes. The question is why we care about it, and which psychological states within the extension of the ordinary term make the most sense of this concern.

The appeal of hedonism is fairly obvious: the pleasantness of our experience is plainly a matter of great significance; many have claimed it to be the only thing that matters.
