Works by Nikolai Gogol

The little wooden tavern, with its narrow, but hospitable, curtain suspended from a pair of rough-hewn doorposts like old church candlesticks, seemed to invite Chichikov to enter. Confiding a fear of perdition for the perceived sinfulness of his work, Gogol shared feelings of guilt, and expressed a desire for forgiveness.

However, the story is a small masterpiece of pacing, and the descriptive passages when not gory are often sublime--I fell in love with a vista of oxen resting on the steppe under moonlight.

The Inspector

Am I to dig them up again from the ground? If I have deserved it, beat me. I had meant to tell you so before, but somehow it escaped my memory.

Nikolai Gogol's The Diary of a Madman

Yes, you've both hit in the air precisely.

The Inspector

The Russian people rejected his estimate and put their own upon it.
