Based on their combat achievements, friends and foes alike have singled out the men from the German 1st Parachute Division as the best soldiers in World War II, as they at Eben Emael executed the most successful commando raid of the war; on Crete the most audacious attack; and in Monte Cassino the most dogged defense. Both Eisenhower and Montgomery found the planning assumption of a four-division attack completely unacceptable.

Parachuting was not well-developed at this point. For example, he wanted to use his troops to capture the Crimea, and also to occupy the Kola Peninsula near Pechenga, Norway. The Fallschirmjäger had been decimated by the fighting and by the end of the month the division was transferred back to Germany for refitting.
