Outreach work among drug users in Europe: concepts, practice and terminology

The outreach service was established in the late nineties to reduce the levels of drug-related public nuisance in the immediate locality. These approaches were based on a simple cognitive conceptual model: that people make decisions about substance use and abuse based on their knowledge of the adverse consequences involved.

There are no correct answers to this dilemma. When he or she moves around in the young people environments it is the young people who decide the terms for contact.

Outreach work.

Through contact with the exposed youth groups it is possible to receive important information that can be used as a foundation in more primary preventive planning work and other preventive activities. Brief Strategic Family Therapy BSFT is an indicated family-based prevention program that aims to decrease individual and family risk factors through skills building and by improving and strengthening family relationships.

While there are a growing number of evidence-based prevention programs for adolescent substance use and abuse, it is important that prevention efforts remain flexible and responsive to changing trends in use. Preventing early-stage substance use or delaying the onset of use is a goal of many of these prevention initiatives. It is especially during school time and most of all between the ages of 13 — 16 years that most drug careers begin, are established and developed.
