Civil War: Constitution for the Provisional Government of the Confederate States of America

Support for the Confederacy was perhaps weakest in Texas; Claude Elliott estimates that only a third of the population actively supported the Confederacy. Southern cities and industries grew faster than ever before, but the thrust of the rest of the country's exponential growth elsewhere was toward urban industrial development along transportation systems of canals and railroads. .

Lincoln and Davis both took a hard line against dissent. Federal troops were withdrawn from the South, where conservative white Democrats had already regained political control of state governments, often through extreme violence and fraud to suppress black voting. Following the war, Davis was imprisoned for two years, and although he was indicted for treason, he was never tried.
