New at NA Nations Free Indian Records Few passages of history are more striking than those which record the efforts of the earlier French Jesuits to convert the Indians. Early in his formation, Ciszek learned that Pope Pius XI was establishing a center in Rome designed to train priests for work in the Soviet Union.

Jesuit Martyrs of North America

Missionaries did not recognize their role in creating economic dependence, but they understood that their offerings of seeds and cattle were essential to their hope of inspiring conversion. Jesuits did not yet grapple with the legacy of their participation in and support of slavery: that reckoning lay years in the future. In response, Jesuits sought to create an orthodox Catholicism immune to national boundaries, state sovereignty, and time itself.
