Bhagirath Palace: Begum Samru's forgotten haveli in Old Delhi

A mistress of imperial endeavor, the walled city of Shahjahanabad which now stands as Old Delhi, was built in 16th century as Shah Jahan shifted his capital here. Zeb un-

There are many markets, sights and food stalls in this area that have been marked on the map. Apart from Shankar's work, it contains over 30 illustrations drawn from 18th and 19th century sources, including several that have appeared in The Golden Calm edited by the prime raj watcher, M. It lurks in every corner of the sprawling mansion, showing up unexpectedly as you walk from one staircase to another—in much the same way that the Jama Masjid keeps appearing as you meander along the cluttered lanes of the Walled City.

She is one of the members of Gupta family which resides in a small extant section of the haveli. I now need to locate a copy of Pavan Varma's book Mansions at Dusk: The Havelis of Old Delhi 1992.

Bhagirath Palace: Begum Samru's Forgotten Haveli

Hardly any of the grander havelis of the original city have thus survived, but those that have - mostly 19th century creations - are in a sad state and continue to be ravaged with impunity. Together, this author-photographer duo is formidably equipped to communicate a sense of Old Delhi to the brash migrants who now dominate the capital.
