Pramana

There is also explained in the discourses the wrong attitude of mind with which no act of charity should be performed. When further questioned by the Buddha, he said that the minimum qualifications were morality and knowledge without which no one would be entitled to be called a brahmin.

For instance, we find in many discourses the statement: 'He refrains from killing, puts aside the cudgel and the sword; full of kindness and compassion he lives for the welfare and happiness of all living things. This is attained by the practice of meditation upon one of the subjects recommended for the purpose by the Buddha.

The Buddha explained further that nobleness in man stemmed not from birth but from perfection in three categories of morality, achievements of four jhanas, and accomplishments in eight kinds of higher knowledge. It is only when the good deed of alms-giving is performed out of a spirit of renunciation, motivated by thoughts of pure selflessness, aspiring only for attainment to Nibbana where all suffering ends, that the volition that brings about the act is regarded as of superior grade.

Pramana

Although the discourses were mostly intended for the benefit of bhikkhus, and deal with the practice of the pure life and with the exposition of the Teaching, there are also several other discourses which deal with the material and moral progress of the lay disciples. Undesirable elements not having the purest of motives but attracted only by the fame and gain of the bhikkhus began to get into the Buddha's Order.

He then went over all the fundamental principles of his Teaching and exhorted them to be vigilant, alert, and to watch over one's own mind so as to make an end of suffering.

Vinaya Pitaka

Whoever wishes to develop Samadhi Bhavana must have been established in the observance of the precepts, with the senses controlled, calm and self-possessed, and must be contented. Strive well with full mindfulness.
