Lelitoulalu: Roman

Gaudí attended a nursery school run by Francesc Berenguer, whose son, also called Francesc, was later one of Gaudí's main assistants. Concerning ruled surfaces, he said: Paraboloids, hyperboloids and helicoids, constantly varying the incidence of the light, are rich in matrices themselves, which make ornamentation and even modelling unnecessary.

It has three floors: the bottom one for a garage, an apartment and a chapel with catenary arches, with the altar in the centre. Gaudí designed an interesting structure composed of juxtaposed triangles that would support the bridge's framework, following the style of the viaducts that he made for the Park Güell. Gaudí achieved perfect harmony between structural and ornamental elements, between plastic and aesthetic, between function and form, between container and content, achieving the integration of all arts in one structured, logical work.

In 1999, American composer wrote the guitar concerto , which was inspired by Gaudí's work; it went on to win the for. Some of his greatest inspirations came from visits to the mountain of , the caves of , the caves in , the crag of Fra Guerau in the behind Reus, the Pareis mountain in the north of Mallorca and in Bigues i Riells. For this commission he designed two types of lampposts: one with six arms, of which two were installed in the Plaça Reial, and another with three, of which two were installed in the Pla del Palau, opposite the Civil Government.
