Precision and accuracy of modal analysis methods for clastic deposits and rocks: A statistical and numerical modeling approach

But it does not solve the problems in essence. Alternatively, use of a diffracted beam monochromator will reduce background fluorescent radiation, enabling weaker diffraction peaks to be detected. Different meshes yield different number of points, for example 100 points for a 10 cm mesh or 400 points for a 5 cm mesh over 1 m².

A study of rock abrasivity and tool wear in Coal Measures Rocks

The selection of appropriate procedures is dependent upon the samples encountered and personal preference. A mortar and pestle can sometimes be used in size reduction of soft or loosely bound materials though this may cause matting of some samples.
