While visiting friends in , McVeigh reportedly complained that the Army had implanted a into his buttocks so that the government could keep track of him.

Bermuda Government

McVeigh, did not present such cause for concern that the prosecutors were not then meeting their responsibilities as to require the type of direct intervention requested by the defense, this court said: This court does not function as an oversight committee to review the conduct of the government's investigation or a board of inquiry to find all the historical facts about the explosion at the Murrah Building. There, the court was satisfied that the prosecutors were aware of their obligation to respond to defense requests for discovery under Fed. The government's written responses provided much information; denied knowledge of the existence of much of what was requested; objected to the phrasing of some requests as overbroad; denied the materiality of much of what was asked for and complained that the search for the information sought by some of the requests was burdensome.
