Modern day British society has a varied sense of cultural heritage; it is a society that is changing and moving forward as it adds more and more voices to the population, but it is also one that has an undercurrent of anxiety and fear towards those who are minorities. Key Benefit: The Fourth Edition builds upon the strengths of previous editions with its sustained attention to the context in which the literature was produced and its broadened scope of literature that includes the full cultural diversity of the British Isles.

On A New Anthology, Dusty Springfield's Take On Southern Soul Gets Another Look

Impressive work for someone who barely thinks and reads poetry. It was in a mixed order, and it was often hard I mostly enjoyed the non-fiction pieces and some of the fiction short stories, especially Kamila Shamsie's The Girl Next Door and Hanan al-Shaykh's An Eye That Sees. On top of the quality of writing, I also enjoyed that there were different forms of writing present; short stories, poetry, and plays as well. While I might disagree with Sabrina Mahfouz's call for representation as a panacea to fear, hate and bigotry, these are voices that must be heard and engaged with, even if to disagree or challenge our own complacencies. I fell in love with this book because I read pieces about myself, my childhood, my upbringing within the pages and also learnt from Muslim women who expressed struggles different to my own.
