Khovanshchina

Stasov most likely invented her to compensate for his inability to depict the Tsar himself -- the work's only true common thread -- on stage. His suicide, alongside Marfa, and the rest of the Old Believers, was as welcome as it was unlikely. In the end, he is sent into exile, escaping death on account of his high status.

True enthusiasts will want Reizen as well, of course. So the scoring sounds mostly like Mussorgsky, but with hints throughout — sometimes big hints — of Shostakovich. But it is the Shostakovich version 1939-40, drawn on the Lamm completion, that is presented here and is now generally viewed as the best of the several major completions.

The sounds of trumpets can be heard from the forest. There were later versions, including a collaborative one by Ravel and Stravinsky, and one by Russian musicologist Pavel Alexandrovich Lamm. This new score was published in 1963, and has been used for a number of modern performances; it is arguably more representative of's dramatic intentions.

This is the also the ONLY full-length performance of Mussorgsky's opera. The third group, however, led by Prince Golitsin, are supporters of reform, but are seen by Peter as a threat to his autocratic power. Mussorgsky then found a companion in the person of a distant relative, Arseny Golenishchev-Kutuzov.
