My own three children were raised in four languages, and I watched them become proficient multilinguals with a variety of tactics, which had different levels of success depending on their ages, stages of language development, and personalities. In other words, what specifically are my students learning today, and what will it look like or sound like if they got it? Whenever possible, meet with students individually and ask them to share their thoughts as they wrote.

In other words, does the error prevent the student from getting their ideas across, or do you still understand what they are trying to say? Are there any live lessons in this program? We can do this by creating a culture of evaluation that realizes that errors in second language classrooms are to be expected, celebrated, and corrected through modeling. You can send in your homework — short answers, a written text, or a recording of you speaking — and an Espresso English teacher will evaluate it and send you comments.
