In such instances letters were normally left with servants with instructions to pass them on. Richard, the eldest, could boast of two sons whose names were famous in their generation, and are unforgotten in our own—Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and George Herbert, the poet and divine. Yet he did not fall in battle, but after a life spent amid the din of conflict and turmoil of arms, died peaceably in 1349.

Likewise, the various manuscript papers that survive for Lady Grace Mildmay evidence a highly literate Tudor gentlewoman, distanced from the court in rural Northamptonshire, who engaged in spiritual meditations, medical experiments, correspondence, and autobiographical writing. She died in 1523, having had the grief to see her only son, Wriothesley, the second Duke, carried off by small-pox twelve years before.
