The protozoan parasite Toxoplasma gondii actively infects human blood monocytes and induces the production of IL-1 β ; however, the host and parasite factors that mediate IL-1 β production during T. Studies in animals inoculated with the parasite revealed cysts in various regions of the brain, including olfactory bulb. On average, 19% and 31% of surrogates were detected attached to kelp surfaces covered with EPS in unfiltered and filtered seawater treatments, respectively.

A complete coding sequence of Toxoplasma gondii SAG1 was cloned and inserted into an Escherichia coli expression plasmid and sequenced.

In infected cells, the number of host LD and the expression of host LD-associated genes ADRP, DGAT2, progressively increase until the onset of parasite replication.

Results of limited RFLP-PCR genotyping indicated the presence of T. Here we use the obligate intracellular parasite Toxoplasma gondii to probe this interaction for isoprenoids, abundant lipidic compounds essential to many cellular processes including signaling, trafficking, energy metabolism, and protein translation. Coevolving parasites are likely to attempt to circumvent this obstacle.
