<sup>1</sup> It is generally agreed that the medieval family was a nuclear family, essentially based around a core unit of a coresidential couple. It was not necessary for a public ceremony to be held, or for their families to consent, although these things were seen as desirable, and were recommended by the Church. The latter, of course, have more relevance for the early era, and the juxtaposition of canon and common law comes into play mostly in the late middle ages.

The main sources are secular and canonical legal texts and literature, which both incorporate and reveal the prevailing secular and ecclesiastical ideologies of marriage.

Focusing on a number of key themes important across the period, individual chapters discuss the themes of consent, property, alliance, love, sex, family, divorce and widowhood. Thus, time, place, religion, and culture were important and mutable determinants of the family.
