3.2 Understanding Culture

The people of the rust belt are now faced with the choice between abandoning their landscape and everything they had invested in it, or finding a way to re-use a landscape heavily marked by the legacy of industrialism in a new way.

Cultural landscape

Cars, airplanes, vacuum cleaners, lamps, radios, telephones, and televisions were all new inventions. DOI: Categorizes the dominant ways of framing human-environment research within geography: environmental determinism, human ecology, natural hazards, human impact, and sustainability. People sometimes make decisions based solely on their impressions of a place.

Cultural geography

This is a sub-discipline of human geography, researching how and why diseases are spread and contained. Anthropologist Ken Barger 1971 discovered this when he conducted a participatory observation in an Inuit community in the Canadian Arctic.
