The Romantic Era: Art, Music, and Literature Essay

Romanticism, also referred to as the Romantic Era, began towards the end of the 18th century. This particular period in time involves an intellectual movement that greatly influenced art, music, and literature. The movement was a reaction against the Enlightenment, with the concept of enlightenment being so popular in Western society. Europe and America were the main areas where the movement took place. The movement was characterized by deep thought, emotion, and an outward expression of the two-depths of which can be observed in the artistic, musical, and literary works that romanticists produced.

During the romantic period, visual artists all had the goal of reflecting their own feelings. They wanted to express their own emotions through their artwork. The art from the romantic era varies widely according to the artist who created it (Gopinath 659). While the previous artwork made by classical and neoclassical artists during the romantic period valued the open and calculable expression of feelings, romantic artists focused on the mystery and reclusion. For example, nature was a manifestation of divine life, immortality, and

Schlegel writes that "...romantic artists deliberately rejected the principles of classicism. Beauty was not a timeless thing. Its expression depended on one's culture and one's age. Beauty was also dependent on the artist's mood, emotion, and temperament" (Schlegel 105). While the previous artwork made by classical and neoclassical artists during the romantic period valued the open and calculable expression of feelings, romantic artists focused on the mystery and reclusion. For example, nature was a manifestation of divine life, immortality, and
