They must continually fight for healthcare, higher incomes, better education and respect from those that may not support their decision to fight for our country. These men and women must remain strong and fearless while being deployed, but what happens when they come home, back to civilian life? If soldiers do not receive the proper treatment for PTSD, the consequences are much greater to their health and that of the loved ones around them. Not only did Sydney threaten female soldiers to get them to perform sexual acts for officers, he then videotaped the act on computers that could easily be seen by numerous government officials.

The history of Western culture has allowed for programs to be tailored to a specific race, class and gender, but when it comes to coping with PTSD, these programs need to focus on the well being of all soldiers. When this abuse is reported, there must be more severe consequences for the accused in order for this to stop. For some soldiers, there is also a fear of being sexually harassed or abused by the men and women within a unit.
