Robert Maxwell remembers architect and critic Alan Colquhoun (1921)

The Chamber transcended mercantile and craft divisions by bringing all businessmen in Glasgow together to pursue the common goal of developing commercial interests. His Scottish background permeates many of his works, not just on police, but also his other great passion, commerce. As a councillor and senior magistrate, Colquhoun would have experienced at first hand the debates surrounding police reform, but the extent to which this influenced his thinking in Treatise needs to be viewed critically.

By the late eighteenth century, the middle-ranks sought to place law enforcement arrangements on a more professional footing, which stimulated a campaign for a police act which lasted the best part of twenty years. There was never a school of Colquhoun.

About Us — LUSS ESTATES

The board was to consist of twenty-four elected commissioners, chosen by £10 ratepayers and from among £15 householders. It was from this intellectually stimulating climate that Colquhoun and police reformers in his native city would draw inspiration.

He worked briefly for, then went to the LCC. From his time as Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce in the early 1780s, Colquhoun was concerned with the detrimental impact dockland crime was having on mercantile interests. However, given his council connections, these are likely to have mirrored those of others in civic circles — namely, that policing arrangements should be under the authority of magistrates.
