While jewelry is typically considered a type of personal property, it's important to consider whether your coverage limits are high enough to protect the pieces you value most. Then, make sure you know what type of personal property coverage you have.

Personal Property

About Personal Property Personal property is every tangible thing, subject to ownership or part ownership whether animate or inanimate, other than money, and not forming part of or permanently affixed to real property, but does not include household goods, furniture, wearing apparel, and articles of personal use and adornment owned and used by a person in their home. The public can purchase personal property that is not needed by federal agencies or by state and local organizations. If a seller indicates to a buyer that she has ownership or the authority to sell a particular item, the seller is prevented estopped from denying such representations if the buyer resells the property to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the true owner's rights.
