Chapter 37. Operations in Evaluating Community Interventions

Process for Designing a Curriculum Program The process of designing a curriculum program that includes components that meet the criteria described in the preceding section requires considerable time and commitment. The challenge is to figure out how to create links between different programs.

Curriculum Definitions and Reference Points

With their emphasis on exposing students to broad, thematic curricula where students can learn in contextual ways, these more recent laws reflect many of Dewey's ideas about schools and schooling.

Curriculum Definitions and Reference Points

If not, its program might not be useful to others dealing with the issue, even if it works well in its own context.

5 essentials for effective evaluation

Historical accounts show us that studies on the continent and in England were little more than loose conglomerates of subjects grouped around faculty members. This contrasts greatly with many of the early career and technical offerings, which were more or less separate entities, often consisting of single courses.
