And, as the author is a retired British officer, there is naturally a stronger emphasis on the War from the British standpoint. For the next half century close air support would remain central to the mission of Marine Aviation, provoking eternal jealousy from the Army which was never allowed to operate fixed-wing fighters or bombers, although the Army was allowed to have some unarmed transports and spotter planes. For instance, Heinz Guderian's name was not even brought up when Corregan detailed the Battle of France.
