Chapter 15: The Ferment of Reform and Culture, 1790

Instead, Romanticism became the chief influence on fashion, as Gothic decoration lavished dresses and historicism inspired styles borrowed from past centuries.

Music was still being composed for the church and the court, but the advent of public concerts reflected the new view that music should be written for the enjoyment and entertainment of the common person. To begin with, one should admit that for the poet the problems of love and death are inseparable and closely bound.
