For some of these men are often bound up in a pragmatic and materialistic philosophy akin to that which forms the basis of Communism. Like NCLB, it requires states to adopt challenging academic standards, test students annually, report out the test results for all students and by major subgroups, set state targets for improving achievement, and hold teachers and schools accountable for the results. Historian Stephen Leberstein has neatly summarized the dilemma facing the accused: With the complicity of board and college officials, the committee was then able to have
