I trust he will confine himself to the males, but this I doubt. It also appeared that Mr. The first extract relates to the Diocese of Meath.

Benjamin Disraeli Letters

I quite agree with you that the present Parliament is fully competent to deal with the questions without previous appeal to the public. The Orange River Sovereignty had been at peace, and in British Kaffraria, under the rule of an able officer, Colonel Mackinnon, the Kafirs seemed, as in 1836, to be making rapid progress towards becoming orderly and civilized British subjects.

4.2 The Stanley Letter 1831

Always ready to impart information, he shrank from the semblance of volunteering it. He wished it to be understood that he owed no obligation to any man, or body of men, for compelling him to submit to the toils of office.

Sometimes he affected to take one, and sometimes another, while practically he may be said to have taken none at all. All I venture to assert is, that there is very little actual compulsion in the case; and I doubt whether the introduction of the ballot would make much practical difference.

Harry Smith

I think, that the mere statement, that the act complained of was done by the authority of the House of Commons, is not of itself, without more, sufficient to call at once for the judgment of the Court for the defendants. As far as we can determine MPS never mentioned anything about Queely Shiell, the man who was almost certainly his great-grandfather. But Sir George Lewis, in speaking of the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches in Prussia, has truly said:— 'Arguments against religious establishments are not, therefore, arguments against religious endowments.

We are quite ready to receive Prince Edward Island into the Confederation, but must leave you to manage it your own way. I can discover no difficulty in the adoption of this course, as Mr. Especially in a country where religion does not work, ultimately, in favour of morality; therefore I am not hopeful, and it is with a mind prepared for failure and even disaster that I persist in urging the measure.
