From "Middle Class" to "Trailer Trash": Teachers' Perceptions of White Students in a Predominately Minority School

Edward W. Morris
Ohio University

This article explores how teachers perceived and interacted with white students in a predominantly racially minority school in Texas. On the basis of ethnographic data, the author describes how teachers' perceptions of white students were shaped by their interactions with white students in this setting, which ranged from "middle class" to "trailer trash." These views of white class stemmed from how teachers interpreted the behaviors of students in the predominately minority school and how these perceptions influenced their interactions with students. An interesting finding was that the black teachers and the white teachers had different perceptions of these white students. The black teachers typically saw the white students as middle class, whereas the white teachers saw them as poor, uneducated, and unreliable income and unreliable students. The results of this study clarify the processes of teachers' perceptions and white advantage.
