The three types of system certification are Design Certification, performed before and during system construction; Installation Certification, performed prior to authorizing a system for operational use; and Recertification, performed after major changes or correction of failures.

In addition, properly operating equipment is susceptible to being tapped or otherwise exploited. While many contemporary machines designed for multi-programming or time-sharing environments incorporate hardware safeguards that provide user isolation, there is very little internal hardware self-checking to guard against malfunctions.

In some installations, it may be feasible to reserve certain terminals for highly classified or highly sensitive or restricted work, while other terminals are used exclusively for less sensitive operation. The Task Force recommends that the United States adopt a national policy establishing and enforcing pandemic readiness standards for hospitals and health systems and ensuring that these institutions respect and promote health equity. However, if, in the opinion of the System Certifier or the System Security Officer, the changes are sufficiently major that security safeguards may have been affected, then some level of recertification tests and inspection will be essential.

The choice of technique or device obviously will depend on the sensitivity of the data resident within the computing system, the physical location of the user terminal, the security level to which it and its communication links are protected, the set of users that have access to it at any time, etc. The few judicial opinions addressing these disputes have suggested that advance disposition agreements signed by both partners could avoid these situations, although one court found that such an agreement should not be applied because of significantly changed circumstances.
